The Drawings Of Paul Bril

Paul Bril died in Rome in 1626. Paul Bril initially painted in the late Mannerist style developed by his brother. These early landscapes are in the Flemish tradition inaugurated by Joachim Patinir and Pieter Bruegel the Elder and further developed by his own brother. Works from this early period were characterised by a picturesque arrangement of landscape elements and violent contrasts between light and dark.

Paul Bril - Wikipedia

Bril, however, would soon do something different with his art by fusing this northern landscape tradition with Italian classicism. Around 1605, possibly under the influence of Annibale Carracci – who, with Caravaggio, was the leading painter in Rome at the time – he began to turn to easel paintings and to refine his landscapes.

The composition with the strongly pronounced tree on the foreground in combination with a meandering river landscape in the back is typical for the "Lugt-group" which found its origin in the Roman workshop environment of Paul Brill (1554-1626) around the 1590s. The drawings associated with this group all show wooded scenes, often with animals at the
