The Lost Weekend is Charles R. Jackson 's first novel, published by Farrar & Rinehart in 1944. The story of a talented but alcoholic writer was praised for its powerful realism, closely reflecting the author's own experience of alcoholism, from which he was temporarily cured.

The Lost Weekend (novel) - Wikipedia

The Lost Weekend's stark portrayal of alcoholism is clear-eyed and unrelenting. There's a playfulness Wilder deploys in his work that both sharpens his points and gives the audience a brief release. It's absent from The Lost Weekend and leaves the audience trapped with writer Don Birnam (Ray Milland, who won an Oscar for his performance). From the opening shot of one of Don's hidden ...

The Monochrome Set's curtain call before Bid launched a haphazard solo career, Lost Weekend offers "Jacob's Ladder," which was almost a hit single (heck, there was even a video). It was not to be, however, despite the move to Warners' subsidiary Blanco y Negro. The irony of the Monochrome Set was that they were always a small-budget band working on the most regal material.
